Protecting legal data from cybercrime and ransomware

How to help keep your practice from becoming a target.

Cybercriminals have found a lucrative target in the legal profession. Because of the sensitive nature of the data law firms keep under lock and key, they can be attractive victims for ransomware attacks. It's all about the secrets that lawyers are required to keep under attorney-client privilege.

In the event of a ransomware infection, law firms must deal with the possibility of losing valuable business data, like any other corporate prey that cybercriminals torment. But often those criminals also steal data and blackmail the firms into paying up to keep their privileged, sensitive information from becoming public.

This is why 29% of law firms—nearly one in three—have had a security breach of some sort.* And it's why the legal profession must create a two-fold approach to cyber resilience that addresses security to protect and detect threats as well as recovery in case of a successful breach. Make no mistake: You must protect client information continuously, but the criminals only need to succeed once to destroy your security, reputation, and law practice.

11:11 Systems has the expertise to help you create a holistic approach to manage threats from cybercrime and ransomware. Our unique combination of managed security services, modern data protection solutions, and comprehensive cybersecurity consultation can help you protect, respond, and secure your business.
